ITEM 1

At the annual African Governance and Leadership Summit held in Addis Ababa, political leaders, historians, economists, military experts, and youth representatives debate the qualities required for effective leadership in contemporary Africa. During one of the panel discussions, participants cite the example of Napoleon Bonaparte, who rose from a relatively humble military background to become one of the most influential leaders in European history between 1799 and 1815.

The panelists observe that during his reign, Napoleon introduced far-reaching reforms in administration, education, law, finance, infrastructure, and military organization which transformed France and influenced many countries beyond Europe. They note that his Napoleonic Code, centralized administration, merit-based promotion system, and emphasis on efficiency helped strengthen the French state and inspired reforms across the world.

However, other participants argue that Napoleon's leadership was also characterized by excessive ambition, dictatorship, censorship, militarism and disregard for democratic principles, and costly wars that eventually weakened France and contributed to his downfall. They contend that modern leaders should not only emulate his strengths but also learn from his mistakes.

The summit concludes that Africa's current challenges including corruption, Weak institutions, poor service delivery, political instability, youth unemployment, constitutional manipulation, and regional conflicts require leaders who can draw relevant lessons from history.

As a student of History invited to represent your school at the summit,

Task

Critically evaluate the lessons that modern African leaders can draw from Napoleon Bonaparte's leadership.

SECTION B

Respond to one item form this section

ITEM 2

At an international economic forum organized by the United Nations, economists, historians, bankers, and policymakers are discussing the causes of recurring economic crises in the modern world. During one of the sessions, participants compare recent economic challenges such as global inflation, unemployment, public debt, financial instability, and disruptions caused by pandemics and wars with the experiences of the World Economic Depression of 1929–1935.

One presenter argues that the Great Depression was not a sudden event but rather the result of a combination of unfavorable conditions including overproduction, unequal distribution of wealth, speculative investment, stock market failures, weak banking systems, excessive borrowing, and poor government responses. These conditions eventually culminated in a severe global economic crisis characterized by massive unemployment, industrial decline, falling international trade, widespread poverty, political instability, and social unrest.

Other participants observe that many developing countries today continue to face similar challenges such as high public debt, dependence on a few exports, corruption, unemployment, inflation, weak financial institutions, and poor economic planning. They warn that unless such conditions are properly addressed, countries may face economic crises similar to those experienced during the Great Depression.

As a student of History, you have been invited to contribute to the discussion.

. Task

Explain how unfavorable economic, political and social conditions can result in economic crises, drawing illustrations from the experience of the World Economic Depression

ITEM 3

At a regional conference on Peace, Development and Integration in the Middle East, political leaders, historians, economists, and development experts discuss the persistent challenges facing the Arab world. Participants observe that despite sharing common historical experiences, cultural traditions, language, religion, and geographical proximity, many Arab states continue to experience.

Challenges such as political instability, economic underdevelopment, unemployment, foreign interference, border disputes, sectarian conflicts, and security threats.

During the discussion, one speaker argues that the rise of Arab Nationalism in the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries was driven by the desire to unite Arab peoples and promote cooperation among Arab states. He notes that the establishment of the Arab League reflected efforts to strengthen Arab solidarity and address common challenges through collective action.

However, another speaker points out that integration among Arab states has faced numerous obstacles including ideological differences, leadership rivalries, economic disparities, external interference, territorial disputes, and divergent national interests. Despite these challenges, supporters of Arab unity maintain that greater cooperation and integration can generate significant socio-economic and political benefits for the Arab world.

Task

As a student of History, you have been invited to prepare a presentation on the benefits of Arab unity in promoting development and stability in the Middle East.
