SECTION A

Respond to both items in this section.

ITEM 1

Pre-colonial African societies maintained peace, stability and economic interaction through a variety of social, political and economic arrangements that differed across communities. These included social systems such as the clan and age-set system, political systems such as councils of elders and customary courts, and trade systems such as local and long-distance trade networks. These arrangements shaped relationships within and between communities and influenced patterns of cooperation, conflict management and resource sharing. Over time, they contributed to the organization of community life and interactions among neighboring societies.

For several years, Doko community has experienced rising youth involvement in drug abuse, theft and the destruction of communal water sources. At the same time, a land boundary dispute between two neighboring families has created divisions that are affecting cooperation within the community and discouraging traders from neighboring areas from participating in the weekly market. Local leaders have also expressed concern over the declining trust in pre-colonial African practices. They feel something should be done to restore peace, rebuild trust and revive economic activities.

Task:

(a) Analyze the ways in which pre-colonial African social, political and trade systems as identified in the scenario contributed to peace, stability and economic development of African communities up to today.

(b) Examine how lessons from these systems can be applied to address the challenges facing Doko community.

ITEM 2

Education systems in Uganda have evolved over time, influenced by both indigenous practices and later external systems introduced during different historical periods. The colonial education system introduced by the British included vocational and technical training that produced artisans, clerical training that produced interpreters and clerks, and mission-based teacher training. At independence, Uganda inherited this education structure. Over time, questions emerged regarding how well the system aligned with national development priorities. As a result, successive governments introduced various reforms intended to respond to changing social and economic conditions and to improve the relevance of education.

Tata community is facing a growing number of unemployed school leavers and graduates despite increasing investment in education. Local industries report difficulties in recruiting technicians, electricians, mechanics and other skilled workers, forcing some employers to hire labor from neighboring countries. At the same time, many young people argue that the education they received did not adequately prepare them for available employment opportunities or self-employment. The situation has affected household incomes, slowed local industrial growth and increased public concern about the relevance of the education system. Education stakeholders within the community want to devise strategies to address the issues.

Tasks:

(a) Analyze the colonial education systems identified in the scenario in meeting Uganda's socio economic needs, and why it persists in the education system today.

(b) Evaluate strategies that the stakeholders of Tata community can use to address the challenges in the scenario.

SECTION B
Respond to one item from this section.

ITEM 3

The nineteenth century witnessed increased European interest in Africa as industrialization expanded and European states intensified their global engagements. This Scramble for Africa was driven by economic interests in raw materials, political and strategic rivalry among European powers, the search for new markets, and control of strategic territories and trade routes. During this period, African societies also developed intellectual and political responses influenced by emerging Pan-African ideas, which encouraged discussions on unity, dignity and self-determination. These developments contributed to growing interactions between Africa and external powers in the late nineteenth century. Although many African countries attained political independence during the twentieth century, competition among foreign powers for Africa's resources, land and strategic influence has continued through investment, loans, military cooperation and international trade agreements. These developments have generated debates about whether current foreign involvement promotes development or represents a continuation of external influence over African affairs.

The leaders of Nabi Community have expressed concern that several foreign companies control the area's major mineral resources while local communities remain poor, unemployed and excluded from important decisions. A stakeholders' forum has been organized to identify historical lessons that can guide the community in protecting its resources while promoting sustainable development.

Tasks:

(a) Discuss the motives behind the nineteenth-century Scramble for Africa and the extent to which these motives continue to drive foreign interest in Africa's resources today as identified in the scenario.

(b) Evaluate the historical lessons from the Scramble for Africa that can be applied to address the concerns raised in Nabi Community.

ITEM 4

European colonial powers established different systems of administration to strengthen their control over Africa after the Scramble and Partition. For example, Britain relied heavily on indirect rule through local chiefs and traditional institutions, France applied policies of assimilation and later association in its territories, while Germany and Portugal favored more direct forms of administrative control. These varying approaches influenced interactions between colonial authorities and African societies. African communities also responded in different ways, including resistance, negotiation and collaboration. These experiences shaped colonial governance and had long-term effects on political developments in many African regions.

As colonial rule expanded, administrative systems influenced African political institutions, economic activities and social relations in various ways. Over time, debates emerged regarding the effectiveness of different colonial approaches, particularly in relation to participation in decision-making and the management of local affairs. These experiences contributed to growing demands for political change in many colonies. Residents of Ukera District have criticized their local administration for introducing development programs without consulting communities, resulting in poor implementation, public dissatisfaction and increasing mistrust between leaders and citizens. District authorities have organized a governance dialogue to identify historical approaches that can strengthen community participation and improve service delivery.

Tasks:

(a) Discuss the administrative systems used by colonial masters in Africa and the extent to which their legacies continue to influence governance in Africa after independence.

(b) Examine how lessons from these administrative experiences can be applied to improve governance in Ukera District.
